General practice in the London Borough of Camden

by

VICTOR W. SIDEL

PETER J. MANSFIELD

Social Research Unit, Bedford College, London

General practice in the big cities of the world is known to have special problems and difficulties. Yet precisely because such practices are often close to the big teaching hospitals they may act as the shop window of general practice for teaching-hospital staff and students. Are they representative of general practice as a whole, or do they have recognisable characteristics?

The Social Research Unit at Bedford College, London has now reported on one of the most detailed surveys of general practice ever carried out in a major borough of London. Some of the findings have not previously been reported anywhere else.

This report was published as Supplement No. 3 to Volume 22 of The Journal of the Royal College of General Practitioners and additional copies can be obtained from The Longman Group Limited, 43-45 Annandale Street, Edinburgh EH7 4AT, price: 75p.
